Tell It To Washington

Have you ever gotten angry about an action taken by Congress or the President? Have you ever wanted to "sound off" to your elected officials or civil servants? More and more citizens are no longer content to confine their complaints to radio talk shows or to neighbors. They are exercising their right and responsibility to get involved in the political process.

Although far too many are still not even bothering to vote, citizens are beginning to realize that making their voices heard in Washington is both effective and easy to do. They know that elected officials are very sensitive to the views of their constituents—especially to those who are thoughtful and articulate. In short, it pays to be a loudmouth, if you get your message across effectively.

That's what this pamphlet is all about—effective communication—helping citizens make use of every available way to "send them a message." Highlighted are tips on making personal visits to your members of Congress and their staff, placing telephone calls and writing effective letters.

Why bother?

Constituents are the most important people in a representative's or senator's life. Their very existence as members of Congress rests upon their ability to take the "pulse" back home—and this is especially true of members of the House, who must run for reelection every two years. They rely upon you and your willingness to let them know your views.

Consider this from former Speaker of the House Jim Wright's book, You and Your Congressman.

If you are wondering whether or not it is really worthwhile to communicate your views to your own senator or representative in Congress, consider this fact. Others who disagree with you are doing so constantly....

Letter writing is the most common way people communicate with their elected officials, and it is remarkably effective. Wright goes on to say,

With exceptions so rare that they are hardly worth mentioning, members of the national Congress positively do read their mail. Moreover, they are interested in its contents. The mood and tenor of the daily mail from home is a recurring topic of conversation in the rear of the House and Senate Chambers or around the coffee cups in the dining rooms of the Capitol.

Even so, you may wish to consider other kinds of contact. The personal visit, for instance, is an option that is often overlooked, but just one visit with your representative can have an impact and will, at the same time, pave the way for future communication. Telegrams and mailgrams*, short and precise, work well too. One visit, phone call, letter or telegram may not always accomplish your goal, but your opinion does make a difference.

Whatever technique you choose, the most important thing is to do it. The first contact can be the beginning of a long and fruitful relationship with your elected representatives. It can bring you the satisfaction of firsthand involvement in the political process. Even if you rarely agree on issues, representatives in Congress should know what their constituents think.

More is better

Of course, lobbying is most effective in the plural. It pays to include friends and like-minded citizens in your efforts. Try to stimulate as many people as possible to write or attend your meeting with your members of Congress. Persuade community leaders and civic groups as well as a cross-section of the district constituency to support your views.

The executive branch

Depending on the nature of the issue, the President or a cabinet member may be a more appropriate person than your congressional representatives to receive your communication. For example, many domestic and foreign policy decisions are made by presidential advisors or in executive branch agencies. Let them know what you think. Sometimes you may see an article in the newspaper indicating that a special committee or commission is being set up to study welfare reform, energy conservation or revision of the penal code. Write. If they have announced that they are having field hearings, invite them to your home town.

If you have been involved in local government or have worked in any depth in a specific area, such as sex discrimination or environmental issues, you are already familiar with that executive branch law-making device known as federal regulations.

*You can send a 20-word telegram called a Personal Opinion Message (P.O.M.) to the President or a member of Congress from anywhere in the United States for $9.95. Name and address are not counted unless there are additional signers. In many states, these same rates apply to messages sent to your governor and state legislators. Check with your Western Union office for rates in your state. Mailgrams cost $17.95 for the first 50 words, which includes the name, address, message and signature. Each additional 50 words or less is an additional $7.00. In some areas, special discount rates are available for multiple Mailgrams and P.O.M.'s. Check with Western Union.

Although the Constitution says that Congress is to write the laws and the executive branch is to implement them, the line between the two has become blurred. In fact, legislative proposals are often initially formulated in the executive branch for presentation to Congress.

Agencies have become increasingly interpretive. The regulations they write can make or break a law—and so can the enforcement policy. Citizens need to pay as much attention during this phase as during the law-making process. The critical times to state your views are right after a bill has passed, in the initial drafting of new regulations to implement the law or when an agency announces that existing regulations are being revised. Contact the appropriate agency directly. For instance, if you wanted to comment on the Food Stamp Program, you would contact the Administrator of the Food and Nutrition Services, Department of Agriculture. A good source of information on executive-branch activity within each department or agency is the Congressional Liaison Office, the Office of Public Affairs or Public Information.

Effective communication

Know the issues

You will already know something about a particular issue when you decide to contact your representative or senators, but you may wish to line up more facts to back up your point of view. Whether you are supporting or opposing a piece of legislation, clear, reasonable expressions of your opinion will get priority treatment on the Hill. Avoid excessive documentation. It won't be read. Try to make your point in one or two pages.

Know your representative and senators

The more you know about those you elect to represent you, the easier it is to communicate effectively. There are many sources of information.

One good source is your local newspaper. If the paper prints voting records, clip them along with other stories on your senators and representative.

Many members of Congress publish newsletters to keep their constituents aware of their activities. Items in these newsletters frequently provide excellent sources of ideas for comment. Ask to be added to the mailing lists.

A variety of public interest groups produce legislative newsletters, too. You might subscribe to those concentrating on programs or issues that interest you*.

You should also know on which committees your elected representatives serve. Most senators and representatives specialize in the issues that come before their committees. There are 38 legislative standing committees—16 in the Senate and 22 in the House—as well as numerous task forces and select and joint committees. These committees break down into more than 200 subcommittees (committee assignments and a list of subcommittees are listed in the back of this publication). In most cases, the basic legislation is written by a subcommittee before it is submitted to the full committee.

If your representative or either of your senators is the chair or ranking member of a committee or subcommittee, those positions give them—and you—added leverage. If your representative or senators are not a member of a committee that has jurisdiction over an item of particular interest, contact the committee chair.

The best way to get to know your elected officials is through direct contact during their campaigns. If your senators or representative know you, one phone call or letter about a piece of legislation may carry more weight than many letters from unknown citizens. Of course, if your elected representatives to Washington have already made up their minds, even contacting them on a "first-name" basis may not be enough to change their opinion at that time. Still, there's always the chance that your views, combined with similar concerns of other citizens, may convince them to change positions.

Know the legislative process

A piece of legislation can go through as many as 25 steps before it becomes fully operative. Legislation begins in a congressional subcommittee or a full committee. The time to contact members of a committee is when legislation is about to come before that committee. Another key time occurs when a bill is about to come before the full Senate or House. You should contact both your senators if it is a Senate bill, and your representative if it is a House bill. To obtain a copy of a bill, contact your representative or senator's district office. Moreover, any legislation that requires federal funding must go through two processes: authorization and appropriation. The first without the second is meaningless. If only limited funds are appropriated, or if executive agencies cut back on

*The League of Women Voters League Action Service informs subscribers when the time has come for concerted action on pending legislation. The service includes League ActionLine, a weekend recorded message with up-to-the minute events in Congress on selected League issues and action League members should take. The telephone number for ActionLine is 202/429-1965.

availability of funds appropriated by Congress, a program can be so restricted that it really can't get off the ground.

Know the budget process

Congress plays a key role in formulating the federal budget. Its budget resolution is a major statement of congressional budget philosophy and intent. Understanding the budget process enables citizens to know when to contact members of Congress about national spending priorities.

Both houses of Congress have budget committees to consider various budget alternatives, including the President's budget recommendation. By April 15, they report to the House and Senate the budget resolution recommending totals for spending, new budget authority, revenues, the allowable deficit and the level of the public debt for the upcoming fiscal year. The resolution also contains reconciliation instructions to congressional committees to bring their decisions into line with the spending and revenue levels in the budget resolution. Reconciliation takes place by June 15. Authorizations and appropriations for federal programs follow until the new fiscal year begins on October 1. Deadlines in the budget process are not always met by Congress.

The personal visit

One very effective way of getting your message across is to make a personal visit to your member of Congress. All members operate an office in their districts and some have more than one. Most members plan well in advance to be in their districts on certain dates. Some members make the trip every weekend. They want to keep in touch with you, the voter, and what better way than a personal meeting? Call the district office for an appointment.

If business or vacation brings you to Washington, be sure to stop in your member's Hill office. Even if your representative is not available, staffers are always glad to meet constituents. Ask to meet the legislative assistant and talk to him or her about the issues that interest you most. Legislative staffers often know more about a subject than the senator or representative; they brief the member, write floor statements and draft amendments. Establish regular ongoing contact with the legislative staffs and your member—both at the district level and in Washington. Be sure to follow up your contact with them; hold your representatives accountable to any commitments or promises they make in speeches or letters.

You may find you know more about a particular issue than either the member or staffer. This is especially likely if the member is not on a committee that is handling the issue. Their lack of information should not be taken as ignorance or insensitivity but rather as an indication of the breadth and complexity of the issues before Congress. In this instance, you will brief them, thus providing them with valuable information and reminding them that there are knowledgeable, articulate constituents in the district.

The telephone call

When you are experimenting with different ways of communicating with members of Congress, don't overlook the telephone call. Used correctly, it can be a very effective action tool. Be sure to be well prepared and well informed, and place your call at a strategic time: just before a vote, for instance. If you have written or visited with the representative remind him or her of that previous contact. If the member is not available, speaking with the legislative assistant for that issue is also effective.

Telegrams, mailgrams, form letters

Form letters are the least effective way to communicate with Washington, but when used as a follow-up to previous contacts they can be quite useful in underlining your opinion. As with phone calls, they are most helpful if sent at strategic times. Volume is also important, so persuade as many people as possible to join you in sending a telegram or form letter.

The letter

The letter is still the most widely used form of communication. Delivered by the truckload to congressional offices, the mail is a major focal point for the legislator and his or her staff. More and more letters arrive by fax, especially when time is tight. You can get your members' fax numbers by calling their office phone numbers listed later in this publication. Each letter is read and answered, and the amount of mail on a particular piece of legislation frequently helps determine the representative's approach to an issue. In fact, some members use their "mail count" on a bill as the sole determinant when voting.

Your letter may be answered with a form letter, particularly if you have written on an issue that has generated many other letters. However, whether you receive a form letter, or a handwritten response from your representative, the important thing is that your communication has been received and noted. If you are writing to a committee member, you may wish to write to your member on the same subject. Originals are best by far, but if time is short, a copy will do with a short, personal note attached.

Recommended approaches to letter writing

It's easy to write a good letter when your senators or representative are in agreement with you on a basic issue:

Dear Mr. Smith.

I was pleased to read in the Congressional Record that you gave a speech on the need to protect air quality standards at the same time we seek more efficient energy consumption and conservation. I hope your speech means that you will support passage of the Clean Air Act....

It is always useful to relate local needs to national legislation. If you have first-hand knowledge of what is happening in your community, include comments in your letter:

I strongly urge you to oppose any federal moves to curtail the availability of student loans. As a sophomore at State University, I know many students who would not be able to continue with their education if student loans were no longer available....

It is helpful to indicate your familiarity with the member's past actions on an issue, particularly if you are trying to change his or her mind:

I know that you have had serious doubts about the effectiveness of the United Nations and have voted against U. S. funding. However, in recognition of the need for cooperation among nations in an interdependent world, I hope you will reconsider your stand and support action to strengthen the United Nations....

The fundamental do's

DO address your senator or representative properly.

DO write legibly. Handwritten letters are fine if they are readable.

DO be brief and to the point. Discuss only one issue in each letter. Quality is more important than quantity.

DO identify a bill by number or title if you can. This helps your representative or senator's staff know which bill you are referring to if there are multiple bills on the same issue.

DO identify yourself. Indicate the state, congressional district, city or county in which you are a voter. If you have family, business or political connections related to the issue, explain them. They may serve as identification when your point of view is considered.

DO be courteous and reasonable.

DO feel free to write if you have a question or problem dealing with procedures of government departments. Congressional offices can often help you cut through red tape or give you advice that will save you time and wasted effort.

DO write to say you approve, not just to complain or oppose. Public officials hear mostly from constituents who oppose their actions. A barrage of criticism gives them a one-sided picture of their constituencies. (A note of appreciation will make your senator or representative remember you favorably next time you write.)

DO include pertinent editorials from local papers.

DO write early in the session before a bill has been introduced if you have ideas about an issue you would like to see incorporated in legislation. If your senator or representative is a member of the committee to which it has been referred, write when the committee begins hearings. If he or she is not a member of the committee handling the bill, write him or her just before the bill comes to the floor for debate and vote.

DO write the chair or members of a committee holding hearings on legislation in which you are interested, if you have facts you think should influence his or her thinking. If the chair is not from your state or district, write your own representative or senators, since it is with them that you as a constituent have more influence.

The fundamental don'ts

DON'T begin on the righteous note of "As a citizen and taxpayer....." Your elected representatives assume you are a citizen, they know we all pay taxes.

DON'T apologize for taking his or her time. If you are brief and to the point, he or she is glad to hear from you.

DON'T say "I hope this gets by your secretary." This only irritates the staff.

DON'T be rude or threatening. It will get you nowhere.

DON'T be vague. Some letters received in congressional offices are couched in such general terms that it leaves the senator or representative and staff wondering what the writer had in mind.

DON'T write to a member from another district or state just because you disagree politically with your senators or representative. Congressional courtesy calls for the recipient of such a letter to forward it to the member from the appropriate district or state.
